

I think it would be a travesty for the FCC to scrap the six ownership limits with so little information about the issue emerging from the mass media. Since the major media in this country clearly face a conflict of interest in reporting on this issue, it is incumbent upon the FCC, including Michael Powell, to educate the public about this issue. I sincerely doubt informed citizens would consent to the proposed changes if they knew about them. If the FCC has any pretenses of being in the business of serving the public, it should start behaving as if it were.
